CHAPTER 05 | 2019-2020 ONWARD; EARLIER FAMILY LOSSES PLACED AT THEIR ACTUAL DATES

Rebuilding

Grief, return, Dubai, and the difficult question of whether financial success can bring Zino peace.

Dramatic question Can Zino build a life he values without allowing betrayal, grief, or the need to prove himself to define it?

Act I - Setup

Returning to Cameroon makes Zino face the distance between the future he expected and the one now available. He spends roughly six months there. Across the wider family story, the Ambazonian crisis has brought bereavement, housing loss, and disrupted livelihoods: relatives who farmed around Kumba relocate, and family members crowd into a two-bedroom home in Douala. His maternal aunt, who fed and encouraged him, is killed. Place these events at their actual dates; their aftermath can return here without implying they all happened after deportation. Home offers connection without erasing loss.

Turning point: Returning cannot restore the earlier world; a new path still has to be made.

Act II - Confrontation

Zino moves to Dubai in 2020 and works for a Chinese online retailer of digital products. COVID becomes part of this new beginning. The chapter should follow the practical realities he remembers: work, money, accommodation, relationships, and the route from employment toward crypto trading. Success cannot be skipped over as a montage of wealth; specific decisions, setbacks, and learning must explain it. His technical confidence survives America, but trust and self-awareness remain dramatic questions. The same drive that helps him rebuild can also make rest, vulnerability, and happiness difficult.

Turning point: A new city offers a livelihood; building a meaningful life requires more than starting to earn again.

Act III - Consequence

Zino eventually becomes a successful crypto merchant. The resolution should rest on a true decision, relationship, or change he can describe, rather than an invented purchase or complete emotional recovery. His mother's house has not been built. That open goal gives success a human scale and prevents the ending from pretending every debt of love has been settled. The proposed redemption is a shift toward a more honest definition of strength: accepting limits, recognizing help, and deciding what to do with opportunity. Grand-Chukuchuku can remain part of his voice without being the standard he must meet.

Turning point: The story ends with a future he can act on, while the promise to his mother remains open.

Rebuilding

At the beginning	He is back in Cameroon after deportation, with a disrupted future and roughly six months before Dubai.
At the end	He becomes a successful crypto merchant, while happiness and his mother's house remain questions to develop honestly.

Three possible short episodes

1. Six Months

One real day after returning reveals how Zino lives with interruption, family expectation, and the possibility of leaving again.

2. A New City, a Closed World

His actual experience of Dubai in 2020 shows how work and COVID shape the restart.

3. The House

A present-day conversation revisits the unfinished goal, using the truth of his relationship with his mother rather than an invented completion.

Memory prompts

1. Date the family losses and relocation. What did you experience directly, and what did relatives tell you?

2. What happened during the six months in Cameroon, and how did the Dubai job become possible?

3. Describe your first Dubai home, workday, COVID experience, and first concrete crypto-business milestone.

4. What does success mean today? What has changed with your mother, what remains unresolved, and what is the real next step toward her house?

Grand-Chukuchuku motif The imagined hero can become a companion to Zino's humanity rather than a demand for invulnerability. This emotional resolution is proposed, not an established biographical event.

Details still open: Do not invent who killed the aunt, the dates of family losses, COVID restrictions, business revenue, or completion of the house. The bridge from the Dubai retail job to crypto success needs Zino's account.
